

Awe Walk

1. Why you should try it

Sometimes it can feel like we're at the centre of our own universe, fixated on our personal concerns without much regard for other people. Experiencing awe can jolt us out of this self-focussed mindset, stirring feelings of wonder and inspiration by reminding us that we're a part of something larger that ourselves.

Researchers define awe as a response to things that we perceive as vast and that transcend the way we understand the world. Research suggests that experiencing awe not only enhances happiness and physical health but also reduces feelings of entitlement and increases generosity. Experiencing awe may seem like something that requires travel to distant lands, but there are many opportunities closer to home – we just need to seek them out and notice them. This practice helps you do just that.

2. How to do it

With the right outlook, awe can be found in almost any environment, turning a mundane experience into a flight of inspiration and wonder. It is most likely to occur in places that have two key features: physical vastness and novelty. These could include natural settings, like a hiking trail lined with tall trees, or urban settings, like the top of a skyscraper.

You're more likely to feel awe in a new place, where the sights and sounds are unfamiliar to you. That said, some places never seen to get old.

No matter where you are, the key is to be in the right frame of mind. This practice is designed to help you get there – to turn an ordinary walk into a series of awe-inspiring moments, filled with delightful surprises.

To get started, turn off your mobile phone. Phones (and other gadgets) can be distracting and draw your attention away from what's happening around you. Even better, don't bring your phone with you at all so that you won't be tempted to check it.

During your walk, try to approach what you see with fresh eyes, imaging that you're seeing it for the first time.

Once you get in the habit of taking walks like this, you may be struck be how frequently you have opportunities to experience awe – they are practically infinite.

Then follow these steps:

1. Take a deep breath in. Count to six as you inhale and six as you exhale. Feel the air move through your nasal passages and hear the sound of your breath. Come back to this breath throughout the walk.

2. As you start to walk, feel your feet on the ground and listen to the surrounding sounds.

3. Shift your awareness now so that you are open to what is around you, to things that are vast, unexpected, things that surprise and delight.

4. Take another deep breath in. Again, count to six as you inhale and six as you exhale.

5. Let your attention be open in exploration for what inspires awe in you. Is it a wide landscape? The small patterns of light and shadow? Let your attention move from the vast to the small.

6. Continue your walk and, every so often, bring your attention back to your breath. Count to six as you inhale and six as you exhale. Notice – really notice – the multitude of sights, sounds, smells, and other sensations that are dancing through your awareness, usually undetected.

As you move through your day, take note of the moments that bring you wonder, that give you goosebumps: these are your opportunities for awe. They may be in city areas, in front of art, listening to music, or connecting with others. Go out and find your awe moments and listen to them carefully; see where they guide you. As they stir humility and wonder, you may discover that they point you toward what you're supposed to do while you're here on Earth.

3. Why it works

Research suggests that awe has a way of listing people outside of their usual routine and connecting them with something larger and more significant.

This sense of broader connectedness and purpose can help relieve negative moods and improve happiness, and it can also make people more generous as they become less focussed on themselves.
